We Are Not Who We Used to Be

By Christine Phillips (mom of Aine)

We are no longer the same people we were before our daughter died. A huge emotional displacement has taken place and we are permanently altered. A tragedy has befallen us; a trauma has occurred. We are not able to return to our prior selves because those selves have died with our daughter.

Since my dearest little one left, time has crept by slowly and mercilessly. Each tick of the clock means that she has been gone that much longer and the sadness deepens. Each tick of the clock also means we have moved a step forward, awkwardly and with much resistance, but forward nonetheless. With this intrinsic forward motion comes a decision every bereaved parent must make; to either stagnate in our grief or adjust to our circumstances. With stagnation one would remain idle and rust, with time still progressing; you would reach a point of death among the living. With adjustment comes work, emotionally exhausting work, but ultimately, survival among the living.

My husband and I choose adjustment; we have a living child who deserves her life with her parents present, to the best of their ability. Choosing to adjust to our new, devastating circumstances means that we have to also adjust to these new “selves” that we are; people around us and we ourselves have to come to terms with who we are now and not who we were then. This is a process that demands the slow ticking of the clock. It is a direction which demands patience with ourselves and each other and those around us. We are mourning our daughter immensely but at the same time mourning the loss of who we once were and the life we used to lead. Our living daughter is mourning the loss of her parents of before and our family and friends are wondering how to deal with these new people we’ve become.

To be blunt, we are not the people we used to be but nor will we ever be again. No longer do we look at life the same. There is a shadow, a darkness that envelops all that we see. A lovely sunny panoramic view of New England Fall foliage is no longer. Instead it is a cloudy, bland view of ‘so what’. The freshly fallen snow is no longer white, fluffy fun; it is a cold and tiresome chore. The sound of certain pop songs used to be energizing and silly and made us want to dance. Now they are loud, obnoxious reminders of what once were happy memories. I was accustomed to other people’s idiosyncrasies; now I find myself annoyed and inconvenienced.

I am hopeful that there is a place of neutrality, where one can find a space inside one’s mind and heart to tolerate our new selves and circumstances; a place where we can exist in our own melancholia and occasionally feel contentment. If we appear positive or maybe even upbeat, please don’t confuse this with a thought that we’re getting “over it”. Just because we might appear ok in that moment, do not assume we are; we are not ok and we never will be. We are simply trying to adjust.
MISSing Angels Bill Signed: Momentous Day for Grieving New Mexico Families

Submitted by Carol A. Clark

SANTA FE—New Mexico joins 33 other states in changing its treatment of stillbirths. Governor Susanna Martinez signed HB658 into law April 4, 2013.

The MISSing Angels Bill, as it has commonly been known in other states, establishes a Certificate of Still Birth to be issued by the Bureau of Vital Records to families upon request after a baby is stillborn.

Unlike other states, New Mexico’s bill also changes the reporting requirement to follow the recommendation of the Centers for Disease Control.

Since 1980, New Mexico has been reporting fetal deaths at 500 grams. The new reporting requirement is set at 20 weeks, or 350 grams if gestational age is unknown. New Mexico was the last state in the nation to use the higher limit.

This change will affect research efforts into the causes of stillbirth, and New Mexico’s statistics will no longer be eliminated from statistical data for being outliers.

There are approximately 30,000 stillbirths in the U.S. every year. In nearly half of all late-term stillbirths a cause is never found, even after autopsy.

The new law allows women who have suffered previous losses in the gap between 20 weeks and 500 grams to file a delayed report of fetal death with the Department of Health when proper documentation is presented. Medically, stillbirth is defined as a fetal death after 20 weeks. The changes in this law will afford women who had previously undergone unacknowledged suffering opportunities to add their children to state records.

Certificates of Still Birth can be issued for losses previously filed with the Department of Health from 1980 to present. Where records have not included a name for the child, families will have the option of adding a name to the certificate.

Through the efforts of a small, dedicated group of activists—with support from The MISS Foundation—New Mexico will finally acknowledge the trauma and loss of stillbirth. Carin Dhaouadi of Albuquerque, Haio Golden of Los Alamitos, and others have been working to get this bill signed into law since 2007.

Dhaouadi’s daughter, Malak, was born still in 2006; Golden’s son, Jesper, was born still in 2003. Over the years, they have received help and support from countless other families who have suffered similar losses.

“This is a momentous day for grieving families in New Mexico,” Golden said.

“I have hope that through research and awareness fewer families will suffer the sadness of stillbirth,” Dhaouadi said.

Integrating Emotional Trauma

Trauma recovery is an oxymoron.

Published on March 24, 2013 by Robert D. Stolorow, Ph.D. in Feeling, Relating, Existing

As I chronicled in my last blog post (http://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/feeling-relating-existing/201303/l-it-be-you-when-the-deal-goes-down), two central, intertwining themes have crystallized in the course of my ongoing efforts to grasp the essence of emotional trauma. One pertains to trauma’s context-embeddedness—painful emotional experiences become enduringly traumatic in the absence of a welcoming relational home or context of human understanding within which they can be held and integrated. The second theme pertains to trauma’s existential significance—emotional trauma plunges us into the devastating recognition that, in virtue of our finitude and the finitude of all those we love, the possibility of emotional trauma constantly impends and is ever present. I also suggested that in the context of an understanding, holding relational home, traumatized states can cease to be traumatic, or at least cease to be as severely and enduringly so. continued on page 5

Now, however, I wish to add an existential qualifier to that last claim. Like its analogue, “secure attachment,” “trauma recovery” is an oxymoron—human finitude with its traumatizing impact is not an illness from which one can or should recover. A felt requirement to recover from, or become immune to, the circling back to emotional trauma can be a source of intense shame and self-loathing when, as is inevitably the case, it cannot be achieved. As I spelled out in my book, World, Affectivity, Trauma: Heidegger and Post-Cartesian Psychoanalysis (Routledge, 2011; http://www.routledge.com/books/details/9780415893442/), “recovery” is a misnomer for the constitution of an expanded emotional world that consists alongside the absence of the one that has been shattered by trauma. The expanded world and the absent shattered world may be more or less integrated or dissociated, depending on the degree to which the unbearable emotional pain evoked by the traumatic shattering has become integrated or remains dissociated defensively, which depends in turn on the extent to which such pain found a relational home in which it could be held. This is the essential fracturing at the heart of traumatic temporality and the dark foreboding that it is its signature emotion.

NIMH abandons DSM-5

As many of you know if you follow our work, the MISS Foundation has vehemently opposed the DSM5 because of its conflation of normal grief when a child dies with mental disorders, specifically Major Depressive Disorder (MDD). As such, our organization helped launch a boycott against the DSM5.

News hit recently that the federal research institution, at the NIH (the NIMH), agrees, stating that “The weakness is its lack of validity,” and that it is going to “re-orient its investigations away from DSM categories.” This is a big move with broad implications for clinicians and researchers around the U.S.

Indeed, reliability field testing for the MDD (clinical depression) diagnosis in the DSM5 showed grim results with very poor validity.

We are VERY proud of our organization’s BRAVE and revolutionary stance to protect bereaved parents and families from over-ambitious diagnoses of mental illness and inappropriate medical treatment of bereavement.

Our organization is committed to civic love and compassion, social support, ritual, self-care, spirituality/existentialism, deep listening, human connectivity, and remembering our dead as a means through which we slowly learn to cope with life’s most tragic circumstances.

Phoenix mayor’s proclamation honors bereaved parents

In a Phoenix City Council meeting on May 7th, Mayor Greg Stanton recognized the work of the MISS Foundation by proclaiming May 19 Bereaved Parent’s Day in Phoenix, AZ. In his proclamation he stated:

“WHEREAS no family should have to endure the pain of a child’s death alone: the MISS Foundation is committed to building supportive and mindful communities in memory of the children who lived, who died, and who continue – even in death – to matter, and

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Mayor Greg Stanton, do hereby proclaim this day, May 19, 2013 MISS Foundation’s Bereaved Parent’s Day in the City of Phoenix and I call this observance to the attention of all of our citizens.”

In Memory Of

Merina Yemaya Satori, beloved mother, sister, and friend, died on April 1, 2013 peacefully in her Sedona home of metastatic lung disease. She is survived by her three sons Robert and Laurie Van Tassel of Victoria, B.C and their three daughters Heather, Camille, and Allison; Michael Van Tassel of Ann Arbor, MI, and Jeff Van Tassel, Erica, and their son Trevor of Long Beach, CA. She was sadly preceded in death by her beloved daughter, Kathy Moore, who died September 4, 2009, and she is also survived by Kathy’s children Louis and Kayla. Merina was born October 25, 1935 in Grosse Point, MI where she spent her childhood. She received her baccalaureate at the University of Michigan in 1957 and in 1973 went to Eastern Michigan University for her Master of Arts in Educational Psychology. She later returned to the University of Michigan where she received an advanced degree in the Combined Program of Education and Psychology. Merina spent her early career working in the Michigan schools as a psychologist. In 1981 she moved to California with her daughter, Kathy, and was the district’s psychologist for several years. She moved to the central Oregon coast in 1990 after retiring where she lived and wrote poetry for 20 years. In 1998, she wrote a book, an autoethnography of healing during her first experience with cancer. In 2007, she moved to Sedona because of her love of the red rocks and the inherent beauty of northern Arizona. Merina had a fierce love of books, music, literature, film, the arts, and the natural world, particularly water and trees. Throughout her lifetime, she maintained an abiding love for animals, with especial gratitude for her beloved horse and the dogs of her youth.

Merina was, and will always be, a beautiful woman inside and out who is loved deeply and will be remembered by many. Memorial contributions can be made to the MISS Foundation, an international organization that aids grieving parents, in honor of her and her daughter Kathy Moore, 77 E Thomas Rd, Ste 112, Phoenix, Az 85012. In addition, you can plant a tree in the national forest through the Arbor Day Foundation.

Jimmie Johnson Foundation Recognizes MISS with $10K

The MISS Foundation was recently nominated for an award from the Jimmie Johnson Foundation, and chosen as a winner to receive a $10,000 grant, and an ice cream party sponsored by Blue Bunny. In addition, the MISS Foundation LOGO will be worn on by the BRAVE and HEROIC NASCAR driver in an upcoming NASCAR race to raise awareness and support for our mission to help grieving families. Thank you to Jill and Brian Bobier (parents of precious daughter Brianna) for nominating us.

Special thanks to Jill and Brian Bobier, parents of precious daughter Brianna, and to Jimmie Johnson and his staff for this really important recognition of the very good and very important (all-too-often overlooked) work of the MISS Foundation.
